Historical context:

This cartoon, inspired by *Yertle the Turtle*¹, depicts the aftermath of the Panic of 1907 as a shaky tower of turtles symbolizing the U.S. financial system. At the top sits J.P. Morgan, whose wealth and influence helped steady the system during the crisis. Below him, layers labeled with banks, trust companies, speculators, Wall Street, and everyday depositors, show how everyone was stacked on one another, balancing uneasily. The “burp”² represents the small disturbance that triggered the panic: not a full crash, but enough to topple the public trust, which falls into the “Lake of Despair.”³ On the left, President Woodrow Wilson⁴ approaches with the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, ready to establish the Federal Reserve⁵ and provide lasting stability.
